About the Presentation

Big name firms have recently restructured, and already look to reap the rewards – sales are up for General Motors and Ford. But many smaller Canadian firms have suffered during the recession. Should they now "Restructure for the Recovery"?

This webinar by The Canadian Institute of Chartered Business Valuators, using material from a recent Institute research survey, will show that Canadian businesses are using the processes of restructuring more frequently and effectively than in the past, to handle unmanageable debt, change financial arrangements, streamline operations, and undergo essential "creative destruction, renewal and reinvention".

The media has moved on to its new story, and is now shouting about recovery. But a number of Canadian companies have been damaged enough by the downturn that restructuring may be their only viable way forward to participate in the recovery. And those Canadian companies that survive, often through the process of "creative destruction and reinvention", will do well as competitors fold.
